An Argentinian football fan found a unique way of expressing his displeasure at his team's performance. The Argentinos Juniors supporter threw his false teeth at the manager after a fifth straight defeat. Unrest had begun to grow in the crowd after Martin Zapata's strike had given Belgrano a 3-1 second-half lead. When the TV camera panned to a close-up of the team's manager though, the TV director spotted something on the grass next to the manager. And then zoomed in on the dentures. The supporter remains unidentified. [orange.co.uk, accessed 23.5.13]

An “incompetent” plumber made a mistake. The workman caused a problem after botching a job by leaving a hole in some piping. He had punctured the pipe and had failed to carry out a straightforward test which would have located the leak. Hours later, the owners smelt gas and began searching. While checking out a room in which the electricity had been disconnected because of the repairs, the owner flicked on a cigarette lighter and the flame ignited a massive explosion which rocked the house. The blast had such force that the entire building moved an inch. [telegraph.co.uk, accessed 23.5.13]

According to a new study, far from falling out with each other or being cut-throat rivals for the next promotion, office friendships are closer and more emotional than any other. People of all ages and backgrounds are often thrown together without any notice and yet have to spend several hours a day side by side, often in stressful situations. This increases the likelihood of tight bonds of friendship. It's felt that the demands and stressful environment of the workplace shape emotionally close friendships. On the other hand, friendships outside work are usually formed through common factors. [telegraph.co.uk, accessed 23.5.13]

A great-great-grandmother celebrated her 99th birthday in Hampshire—by abseiling down the side of a building. Her name's Doris Long and she already held the world record for the oldest person to abseil. She scaled the building to raise money for Rowans Hospital. Mrs Long, who took up abseiling at the age of 85, has carried out a total of eight descents for the charity. After her descent Mrs Long, who is known as 'Daring Doris', said she was looking forward to her birthday party. [orange.co.uk, accessed 23.5.13]

The popular Norwegian crime writer Hans Olav Lahlum set the world record for the longest interview. He spent more than 30 non-stop hours chatting in a broadcast. Lahlum rarely paused for more than a few seconds. He discussed a broad range of topics. At one point, he said “I think that tonight I might go to bed a little earlier than usual.” And then a bit later, shortly after surpassing the previous record, Lahlum plunged into a lengthy discussion on Norwegian playwright Henrik Ibsen. How will they get him to stop talking? [reuters.com, accessed 23.5.13]
