They say nothing ever happens in small towns. But in East Berlin, Pennsylvania, thieves are stealing traffic signs, to tell the truth mostly speed-limit and stop signs. So last week the little town put up signs which read: “don’t steal signs.” They disappeared the next night, of course. [hosted.ap.org, accessed 10.11.2014]

One has to be careful when buying a home in Dublin. Families can be forced to pay tens of thousands of euros more for their home if it is very close, that is less than 500 metres, from a primary school. The same study showed, however, that families do not pay more to live near an upper secondary school, even one which has a good record of getting its students into top universities.

For the last month the people who live on one old street have had to make a four-mile round trip to collect their post from the centre of the city. And this is due to health and safety fears over the state of their pavement. Two postmen have been injured when they slipped and fell on the pavement. Royal Mail refuses to deliver because the paving blocks are so badly broken. Well, Royal Mail has really made these people angry.

A man drove his very large truck along a walking path at a park. He finally realized that he was on the wrong “path” and came to a stop. He says his GPS device is to blame. He had punched the coordinates of his destination into his navigator, but the device led him to turn onto the footpath. Several trees were damaged in the park.

Good morning, I’m talking about a book that changed my life. A few years ago I realised that Tove Jansson’s book Finn Family Moomintroll was precisely what had made me into a professional writer, a novelist actually. There’s a wonderful scene where Moomintroll throws the dictionary into a magic hat. At night the words crawl out of the dictionary and all over the house. Tove Jansson’s book set my direction.
